RESEARCH shows that the majority of people who are obese are not aware of their condition. This is a concern because obesity is a leading cause of heart disease, diabetes, and other chronic conditions. The researchers found that only about 10% of people who are obese are aware of their condition. This is a significant finding because it suggests that many people who are at risk of developing chronic conditions are not taking steps to prevent them. The researchers also found that people who are obese are more likely to be unaware of their condition if they are older, have a lower education level, and live in a lower socioeconomic status. This information is important for public health officials because it suggests that targeted interventions are needed to help people who are at risk of developing chronic conditions become aware of their condition and take steps to prevent it.
